ANGELS OF FIRE

Out west, fire swallows an ever-widening circle of forest tonight, like a wish kissed on a coin and cast in a fountain will repeat itself, grow larger over water’s silver surface. On TV, a reporter stands in the fluttery glow. It spills into our room, stains your pale skin infernal, lovely as any good sin, or the monarch butterflies one June which set the sky alight, the hushed applause of their delicate wings dusting our breath with gold.

It was the last summer we possessed the shapes of boys, which is no shape, really, and we’d run, shirtless, beneath acres of sheltering oak, sweat lacquering our chests as the sky slit its own throat and heat shimmered off asphalt, set our neighbourhood afloat.

Down the street, fire caught a classmate of ours so unaware that when she woke it was not in this world where her mattress steamed like an ancient altar and her silhouette, coiled around itself like a cat in a sunlit window, slept on its side even after her slight body was clothed in cool satin, strewn with blushed rose petals handed to us by black-mantled nuns as we filed past the alabaster casket which stood open like a music box whose tiny dancer had grown tired of the dance. You whispered your envy to me in the vaulted shadows of that church, how she had become like those eider-winged spirits who graced the stained glass windows or rose above the crèche’s spare gable each winter—as if death transmutes without discretion, each one of us destined for the same eternity.
I remember how we walked to your angel's house three days after she died. The scent of smoke and water. Silence like a shrine. I can still see the foyer going dim with evening, blackened ribs of lumber which once held the roof at its elegant pitch, ghost shadows seared against walls—clock, cabinet, crucifix—as if each object was only briefly absent and meant to take form again like the closed faces of night-blooming jasmine at noon. The gunmetal tang of an approaching storm drifted through shattered windows as we climbed the winding stairs, and when you smiled, turned towards me, failing sun caught in your hair like braids of beaten copper. Then you leaned against the balustrade which seemed to melt beneath your hands, spindles of ash crumbling as you faltered, then disappeared into grey atmosphere.

If I prayed, it was for the gift of wings. And if that prayer was answered, it was the same reply Icarus received. Then there was only the sound of a distant mower. No breath. No cry from you who lay perfectly still as that child in her grave. I cradled you the way water holds the quiet bodies of the drowned, each moment's passing like the sound of goodbye. When I pressed my mouth over yours it was the taste of the coming rain. Then lightning cut the sky like bright ribbons torn from unexpected packages and you gasped, lungs filling with charcoaled air.

Tonight, you said it must have been an angel who bore you out of the luminous throat which had swallowed you whole and back to this world where your body looked like a stranger held fast in my embrace. My Love, I don't believe in angels, unless they are only hungry ghosts of the reluctant dead haunted by memories of our sensible gifts. Angels of fire. Of storms. Angels transfixed by that long-ago sky flecked with impossible gold or the simple beauty of prismed candlelight caught in sweat which beads between the soft rise of your breasts, whose envy turned a blind eye as flames ate their way up those stairs now decades gone. Whose mercy flung out an unseen net to hold you dazed but unharmed, your breath dark as the underbellies of rain-laden clouds. The thrum of your heart like an ovation. Like thunder.

The Binding of Isaac

Perhaps it was a voice like ten-thousand bowstrings drawn tight as a well-kept secret, a sound which rose from a nimbus of flies that vexed the inarticulate tongue of a sacrificial dove. Or perhaps it was the unanswering stillness when woven garlands, grain, gems, lay strewn in elaborate temples, salvation's map withheld for want of a throat opened wide as a traitorous smile~whatever could possess a father to take in one hand, fire, the other, a curved blade, bind his beautiful son ankle to wrist, ankle to wrist, cuffs of blood circling bone like bands of gold as morning unbolted the crimson sky.

Then there was only the rough stone altar. No voice appeased by blind obedience. No swift and muscular angel summoned to stay the gnarled hand. Just a young man curled around the shape of his breath, his long brow, abrupt chin, familiar as the rasp of sand against yellowed teeth, the truth of what
