1998

On the Street

Ruth Stone

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5059

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
ON THE STREET

Each day you pass this woman sitting on the sidewalk.
She is pressed against the building.
She is wrapped as for a funeral pyre; shawls wound around her.
Only her face looks out of this cowl and her hands, ready to turn palms up, if you are not hardened to her.
If you allow yourself to look closer, you see her, as though adjusting a microscope. Her skin comes into focus.
It is layered like fallen leaves; blue around the lips and blotched with ochre and brown.
The flume of the avenue sweeps as in a monsoon; a patterned commerce of debris. If you hesitate, you are sucked into a chalice of saints and miracles; the body’s unexpected lush response to all you have hidden from yourself.

SORTING IT OUT

Falsely soft, infinitely far, the chlorophyll machine.
Each socket knocked by a photon from the mother star.
It’s the trees and their green flesh.
Listen, our fingers feel the hiss.
The great blue whale picks up the sonar.