people passing by but give witness to those things beyond the eye to define the complexion of each day the vast tissue of connections that decides each act their day nothing less than the open acknowledgement of those unpayable debts a practice like fully living or dying like seeing or hearing for the first time like the gift of giving or receiving freely like the world suddenly without sound or suddenly full of it

BLACK MARKET
Tokyo, 1946

In the burned-out open-air square there are no stalls no animals cars or banners just thousands of men some still in uniform some in partial uniforms some in topcoats and fedoras some in chinese coats looking for something that can’t be found the disaster evident from the piles of valuables spread on blankets from a bird’s eye view the man-clusters slowly drift into new clusters the castastrophe has already happened this is the post-apocalypse all the odd jumble of the past the detritus of former lives is struggling to be reborn in the buying and selling a new life everyone is looking down see the one who squats on his haunches to inspect a book see the tall man in black who refuses to buy further back a white-hot light boils overhead everyone is becoming less and less they are fading not even becoming a negative of themselves and in that bright light the buildings are dissolving and that light that unnatural musical light is breaking in waves over a future which is unaware
