Leaves in Fall

Marianne Boruch

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5187 It’s just that—bad cello!— the rondo? I like it, like to play it twice because no words! Because I do it so badly! Delicious part going minor, right down the hole, neither—what I thought-nor—

LEAVES IN FALL

They come down, straight down or crooked, fast or drunken. Wind might do it, might call the cruel trick but they’re starving anyway, light’s sugar nothing so sweet now, and then this mysterious business of turning a drastic color. I rake.
I rake the damn sad things all morning, past lunch.
What was I thinking?

That certain things have to be done. That the earth orbits slowly. That beauty gives up its beauty. Huge piles of it—maple’s yellow, the elm’s ghost gray, hackberry with its sulfurous boils curled tight. Maybe someone else said this: the sky is a pearl, darkening.
Or this: it’s bad milk, not a cloud against anything.

So I rake and drag it all on a tarp to the curb, the heavy scrape scrape of it past birdbath and trellis, past the cockeyed seasick mums, past the torn shade of playroom, study, frontroom where the old piano sits completely out of tune. Dark inkling it was, to the nether world of the minor key.

The dead

lean forward.