SMALL BOYS PETTING CATERPILLAR

Somewhere, a god
is handling our hearts.
Wonder can kill, accidentally, what it loves.

It’s summer. The ditches are full of fish-scales and glitter. Also the sepulcher, the tomb, the pit. Someone has scraped them out of the air with the dull edge of a knife. Someone has told them to be gentle, and now their little hands are light as prayers. If they breathe, their hands will float away.

The music of dust in water.

One of them is trembling. One is bouncing with his legs crossed.

Perhaps he needs to pee.

Above us, on the highest limb, a dangerous piece of fruit dangles.
A teenage girl is stepping all over the sunshine in her silver shoes. Perhaps that piece of fruit will simply drift into her hands.

It did, for me. Swiftly,
but with wings.

And the caterpillar is a word, a soft bit of star. Oblivious, our hearts. Could that word be faith, or trust, or is it some other word which means to let go in ignorance, or to hold one’s breath and hope?

And would that word be love?

It doesn’t matter because we’re helpless in the hands of what does.