SUSTAINING THIS MASSIVE SHADE

1.
Of all that is left to occur
when nothing moves
but beneath my skull
   a dog stretching tremulous forelegs.
Cicadas drone in every tendon
while the wind offers nothing
   to keep insects from the skin.
And still he returns
like a new leaf reviving.

In sum, what nightfall has in store.

I keep four calendars he said.

Beneath one moon

Of all that touches him,
the rain that doesn’t fall
   and the woman that lies next to him.
In this age of hands,
where are mine.
I am intact and I don’t care.

My hands in the garden.
Corn bleached
   and malformed by drought
beneath the sick of blue.

I have the white-blue eyes of my ancestors he said,
their narrow skull and their clumsiness in fighting.

Fighting to keep my hand from his belly
   where sleeps a double sex.
Struggling not to touch
the small bones held in by sandals,
I take note of his every step.

Given confidence
and confiding in the agave.

The cactus mourns the memory of feeling and mysterious delicacies seduce me.

That this night would give up

one breath
to stir the downy hairs on his golden legs.
The skin that aches

for want of feather.

3.
How I move between rooms,

the cattle of longing
and think only of that curve

at the base of his skull.

The cowlick clipped
to a choirboy’s mean halo.

I am happy he said.

I am jealous.

Of the planets
that seduce him with greater success
and the moon that lights his pale arm
when he rises in the night.

Walk through the night, gently moving that thigh, that second thigh and that left leg.
