Giving Blood After the Schoolyard Shootings

A transparent man on the blood bank wall his body crowded with the branching and sprouting of the circulatory system what happens inside the heart contracting its red arterial blood swelling the ventricle the blue veins draining the vena cava emptying the limbs she swabs my arm inserts a needle and hangs the plastic bladder out of sight

I squeeze and release a child’s red ball the blood jets blackening the tube the clinic bustling like Intensive Care red flecks speckling the tile a red jewel in the nurse’s ear the sunset coloring the flooded pavement this letting these ruby pools in the parking lot a woman in the next chair describing an article about dreams she hadn’t known how the eye must keep moving even asleep it roams its socket to keep the fluids moving it might dry up otherwise a dream is just something for it to seem to see they’re meaningless dreams it’s just a theory.
