Transference

Rigoberto González

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5432

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Rigoberto González

TRANSERENCE

A warm bubble grows inside me; your body buoy off my back. I twist my neck. I see right through your tongue: its brown vessels constrict into the lines on dry mud.

Breathe into the dusty fissure of my ear and coax me from the ground. My hands have dug into the soil but will fracture at the wrists because they didn’t do what hands should have done when a man becomes a scavenger and attacks. They have ceased to be hands. What breed of flower comes to life from semen and blood? I will hear it break the earth in my sleep.

In the meantime I forgive you. That tender question: Why do you cry? I’m convinced comes from your mouth, though you do not speak. Those words will haunt me as I dream I till a plot of flesh, yanking veins like weeds. When I extract a heart, turnip-stiff, shame will overwhelm me. Only an ingrate would deny this find its beauty. Why do you cry? I will ask. You want it back, all that I took with me to leave you barren and empty?