The Baptism

Walter Bargen

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5464

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Walter Bargen

The Baptism

Years later when he mentions crucified by water, he’s referring to his house flooded two years running: uprisings of river, voluminous snowmelt and spring rain, leveling the valley, making it one long muddy way. A continuous waist-high stain along living room walls and storefront windows. Seasons turning and it can’t be the same river according to Heraclitus, even if it rushes from mountain and sky’s single infinite slope. All the water that will ever exist on earth is already here. What’s not visible is pumped from ancient aquifers, leaving extinct beasts thirsty. If this is every last drop, all rivers are the same, leaving Heraclitus all wet. This man’s water-logged house hasn’t moved.

He declares he’ll drift nowhere else. He finds remnants of different valleys, in the flow of his living room. He wades knee deep in strange lands.