2003

Mathilde, Waiting

Anne-Marie Cusac

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5768

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Mathilde, Waiting

The lamp bothers her most, as if he planned that she would land on her side, gazing up under the shade and the white light would eat into her eyes.

She thirsts, she recognizes the bulb as the thing that cracked in her brain for a long instant, long ago before she fell just so on the nubby rug, her shoes at one edge her head at another.

When she feels inclined to give him credit, she remembers him snapping the rug from the front step as the neighbors walked staring and the rug bucked, cracked, coughed, giving up its dust and crumbs.
Then he came in and spread it out right here and smoothed the lumps so she could lie and wait for the bulb to burn out. A husband is supposed to find his wife if she is lying on the floor, is supposed to make the necessary calls, speak in a low tone, bring the water she would rather have than him, but the lamp stays lit the window goes gold-red, blue-red, black, blue-red again. She adds the time in her head, the effort bores her, she's losing count, she's tired.

When she closes her eyes, she can see him on a deck, binoculars on his neck, behind a run-down house. The sun in the bay looks like a lightbulb. Today the sun is refusing to diffuse.

The sun is wrong. This will tell him to come home. Each time she makes this request, this command or, sometimes, plea, her arm, far too long for a human limb, unfurls from the window and tickles his neck. It is lit, too, white with a filament that runs the entire length and stops in the fingers.