Consider What Passes for Kindness These Days

Erik Campbell

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.5770

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
ERIK CAMPBELL

Consider What Passes for Kindness These Days

The farmers in 1942 Waterloo, Nebraska, would meet at the train tracks, their hands shoved deep and final in their overalls fingering lint, always lint.

My father would stand with his father whose withered arm hung limp at his side, his right hand in his pocket like the other complete, incomplete men, and wait with them for the train to slow through town in a coughing arc where the men were waiting poised with their hands exhumed for the gathering of coal that the hoboes would throw, scooping it out, handfuls of black hail, yawping with beneficence, pleased with their work. The farmers would scurry about the tracks still ringing from the weight; they understood each other’s faces, the small acts that were beyond shame when one had warmth. My father would gather as his father would give a good-armed wave to the hoboes, shouting above the train whistle.

Call it another day of heat, with coal in pockets, everything chalky black. Hands at their sides, collars up, not quite slouching the warm walk home.