To Ease My Mind

To Ease My Mind

If I woke as Mary Todd Lincoln and if Abraham Lincoln slept next to me like an uprooted tree, his knobby fingers unearthed, his face a burl, grey as a Mathew Brady photograph, and if my country were at war, my own cousins killing my cousins, and I’d been told to tear the country’s damask down, shred its opulence to bandage the wounded but I knew it was hopeless, hopeless, there’d be no stopping the blood of filthy, putrid common men until every human left had lost a child, a leg, an arm and if I’d already given everything, if I’d given over my grieving husband—not without kicking and screaming—and the birds were silent to mark the never-ending end, then God forgive me, perhaps I too would turn my mind to the pleasures of kidskin gloves adorned with pearls, embroidered daisies and chrysanthemum stars, white on white filigree so fine one might believe a fairy tatted them.

I might need box upon box upon box of them to tell me who I am.
