Towards the middle of the Great Depression, the tobacco crop having failed for the third year, and at the end of money saved, my grandfather set out on a journey.
They said he just unlatched the gate and kept walking, walking past John Caine’s pasture, past Cader Gwinn’s woods where leaves mellowed to russet and burgundy and deep, deep brittle brown, the last of fall and the best, in Bryson’s Cove, and disappeared into sun so bright no one could see him or keep up or follow, past the Get Right With God wooden cross and chickens in the yard at Miller’s Store,
and he never stopped,
taking the love of his life,
a beagle named Reason,
along the path with him.
All this was told to us children.
All this was before I learned they only lied about important things.

One night the following May, air drenched with pear-blossom scent, while Britta slept and Brady slept, I crept to the dim step landing, drawn by Preacher Shaw’s low drawl:
The shots were heard by the Lockes across the state line in Tennessee.
I pictured old Matthew Locke standing drunk under his one fruit tree before first frost, tossing Golden Delicious apples alive with yellow jackets into a dirty sack while inside his young, pretty wife jerked and doubled up at the shotgun sounds once, eyes dark and fixed toward Cope Creek Community, bit her lip savagely until blood came, and checked again that the grandfather clock was properly wound.
