Where He Found Himself

Stephen Dunn

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.6112

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
Where He Found Himself

The new man unfolded a map and pointed to a dark spot on it. “See, that’s how far away I feel all the time, right here, among all of you,” he said.

“Yes,” John the gentle mule replied, “alienation is clearly your happiness.”

But the group leader interrupted, “Now, now, let’s hear him out, let’s try to be fair.” The new man felt the familiar comfort of everyone against him.

He went on about the stupidities of love, life itself as one long foreclosure, until another man said, “I was a hog, a terrible hog, and now I’m a llama.” To which another added, “And me, I was a wolf. Now children walk up to me, unafraid.”

The group leader asked the new man, “What kind of animal have you been?” “A rat that wants to remain a rat,” he said, and the group began to soften as they remembered their own early days, the pain before the transformation.