2010

There "is" A Birdsong At The Root Of Poetry

Jennifer Moxley

Follow this and additional works at: http://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
JENNIFER MOXLEY

THERE IS A BIRDSONG AT THE ROOT OF POETRY*

for Ann Lauterbach

Hemmed in by an untenable image feathers planted

below fragile branches of avian fee scaly crossroads scoring 138 a particular blue of sky offending

through the uselessness of misplaced forms thorny prongs that make no sense (and yet belong) on the ground

out of which the bird wings stiffly jut rigid as rhubarb leaf

rising from out the muffled beak

THE IOWA REVIEW
site of a perverse smothering throated core submerged Should you kneel the body's aged mechanism beneath the shade of dry feathers Should you place the vulnerable cavern of ear—trembling passage to psyche's failures our fall into suffering knowledge— Should you listen you will hear the wasted strains of an underground song deadened by thoughtless depths but alive

for the dead have kept it safe from false music a ghoulish guard of love safe from she who bullied by the cruelty of others the false sophistication of fashionable libraries the envy of those who would molest the world into false confessions and banish all mystery with their dripping candles who would unearth the birdsong to cage it she who will end by destroying what she loves most

Shhhh, quiet

listen
it is drawn by other amblers its strains awake in our attentions as a sudden bewildering happiness ear wedded to earth, Listen and hear what those who know all can not

Robert Duncan, letter to Denise Levertov, August 22, 1962