2011

The Short Goodbye

Steve Almond

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.7002

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
THE SHORT GOODBYE

Back in the Adirondacks, near the soft sand of Lake Lucerne, where sunfish glittered like giant dimes, in the last days of summer, at dusk, I walked alone in a grove of pines. I had set off in search of some feeling I couldn’t quite identify, a more exalted sense of what it meant to be alive, and received instead, in the stifling August air, a revelation of death. There were no fat clouds, no angels with toothpaste smiles. The dead slipped under and were gone.

This was the summer of my eighth year, spent in a cabin with my grandparents, both of whom I loved more than I would allow. My grandma and her raspy laugh, her green crochet needles knit together under the lamp, like tiny axes whet and whet. My grandpa leaning over the checkerboard with his beautiful crooked teeth. They were burdened people contented by simple pleasures. I should have kissed each of them more than I did. We waste so much of our hearts. Only the dying keep a full account. In their moment of passing, the exact amount is revealed on our tongues, which turn black with regret.