GUIDE

With spring there came that sense of clarity we'd missed all through the rainy months, although the somnolescent clouds still held their ground; the change was slow and what we felt was less the promise of enameled days or that love's blade might strike the jetting vein again as that the bulk of days had shifted in a new direction, away from us, as the sky thinned.

In March I heard Louise in her office above the Visitors' Center haranguing her Forestry contact about the lack of useful information on their website; then, descending from the flight cage, I found four deer legs the funny State Troopers left propped at a standstill in the gauzy mist as if they had outrun their animal.

A cold wisp licked the back of my neck as I considered how the bureaucracy that owns our birds from molt to tail feather compensates for the lack of any central intelligence with a kind of wit barbed with malevolence.
I wrapped the roadkilled legs in plastic bags and buried them deep in the outdoor freezer.
It was like that: the vibrant image, the aftermath.

Days spent crawling under shrieking kestrels to scrub out their whitewashed black plastic tub or in a crabbed dance with our Ferruginous Hawk scunching away on his Astroturf-covered perch, keeping as much distance as his small cell allowed between us as if by mutual agreement—although our only mutual is the tethering hunger we use to bind our birds to us and overcome their deep rooted abhorrence of the human face, dreadful to her as to all other animals.

  Always, the face of man is the lion’s face.
As our almost-eagle stretched out a wing like a broken comb, I felt again the shame of an instinctive reaction to the powerlessness of love rebounding on its object.

Outside the rotting salmon dumpster-stink which seemed to issue from our Osprey’s wound and filled her cage, or where our Turkey Vulture Lethe pecked at the exposed veins that are my bootlaces, the spring flowers bloomed out a counterpoint, white petals of Trillium echoing the green, Star-Flowered Solomon’s Seal, Indian Plum and the Red-Flowering Current.

You know how any practiced speech becomes theatrical?—so the rote recitals of my guide talk turned my voice into a stranger’s leading you through the small cell of my self-consciousness, a voice at odds with its subject, ingratiating, false; and these cages only numbered and labeled boxes in the warehouse where they’re storing the disaster.

Then the little difference between the dead bird in my hand and the one with a yellow eye aimed at my handful of quail narrowed to nothing and I became elegy’s functionary.
Brown-veined petals of the Yellow Wood Violet, deep rose flowers of the Salmonberry, Star-Flowered Solomon's Seal, Indian Plum, Red-Flowering Current and Western Trillium.

Here is my day: a drawer of mice I shake to keep excessive life from spilling out then slide in the asphyxiating oven.
 The resigned feet entering the beak, the tail curlicuing into a question mark, as if still curious of what it entered into.
An owl with one eye cataracted blind, the other bright with purpose, focused beyond, to where the netted shadows of the State Forest fall on the bright borders of our groomed lawns and trails. At my shift's end the sky also locks down, and in the old-growth trees surrounding us a wooing, hooing voice evades its source as we listen, trying to draw shades of meaning between the call and its corresponding, captive answer.

We like to think they call each other out of love, which we find sweet; what weirds us out is not the Great Horned male moving inside the light-excluding heights just outside our borders, his voice always one flight removed from the still-trembling throat we feel as ours, become the body of his audience, or how it brings our half-blind female awake to the extreme of her confinement, clambering up the chicken wire; but how they start calling

ANDREW FELD
too late too late to each other before it's registered on us as dark, and I'm still busy with my tasks, so much, this late impossible to finish, down on my knees with a handful of pellets grained with mice teeth and vertebrae, smaller and finer than life.
