2011

After Winter

Emily Van Kley

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.7075

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.
AFTER WINTER

when we think we have borne everything, we walk to the park to watch salmon batter upstream, their lips spoiling over spiked underbites, shanks ruby-bright with decay. Better than any of us they understand that to compose something beautiful, you must be very hungry. On one side of the bridge they teem, waiting without knowing for the man in the dam-house to open the gate between the river and the swollen ovary of the Sound.
The grave-hearted among us drop lines to water. Dogs strain their leashes, crazy from the smell of meat turning.
Our lovers take our hands and tell us they are leaving, their fingers a hot, brittle shell. Later we lie down in the park with a bottle of booze and a bottle of medicine. We are young and are supposed to feel better.
When a neighbor passes on the path, black hair skull-tight, round glasses planetary in stuttered street lamps, we turn toward water. He sees us or he doesn’t.
In the starting rain the silvered street pebbles away into what came before.