CAPTAIN ALLEN'S EXPLORATIONS

An honored visitor in Des Moines several times following the Civil War was Gen. William T. Sherman, who then had two brothers residing here. One was Lampson P. Sherman, who established the Des Moines Gazette, the first Whig newspaper, and Major Hoyt Sherman, who had been a paymaster in the Union army, and later served as president of the Equitable Life Insurance Company of Iowa.

Sherman’s memoirs contain a graphic account of his visit to the California gold fields in 1848-49, when he was a staff lieutenant in the regular army under General Kearney. The headquarters were at Monterey for upper California, which then was still a Mexican province, in the hands of the United States by conquest, though not yet a part of it, as the war was yet progressing in Mexico.

This was a most interesting epoch, especially to Iowa people, as it was Capt. James Allen, who in 1843 had established Fort Des Moines, in 1846 at Kanesville, now Council Bluffs, organized a battalion of Mormon troops, consisting of five companies, and proceeded over the trail leading to California, most of whom found their way back to Salt Lake, Utah, after being discharged from army service in 1847. Captain Allen died on the march to the west.

It was at Mormon Island, fifteen miles below the place of original discovery of gold, that the richest deposit was found. As soon as the fame of the gold discovery spread, hundreds of the Mormons joined the others in digging for the treasure and prospecting in the “placers.”

Captain Allen’s unfortunate death deprived him of the exciting experiences of the “gold days” on the coast, but he had enjoyed the highlights of discovery and adventure as an early explorer of the Northwest country. As lieutenant and captain of the First Regiment of Dragoons, U. S. army, he is credited with a large share of successful explorations, including territory now northwestern Iowa, and far up both the Des Moines and the Little Sioux rivers. He was a West Point graduate and member of the class with Robert E. Lee and Joseph E. Johnston.

Assigned to duty on the western frontier, and stationed at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan territory, Allen was detached to accompany Henry R. Schoolcraft, with a small escort, to make an expedition to the Indians of the northwest. In June-August, 1832, a decade prior to his establishment of Fort Des Moines at Raccoon Forks, they traveled nearly 3,000 miles in the upper country. The fame of this expedition rests in the fact that this army officer and the scholar-explorer first gave the world an intimate knowledge of the region around and beyond the headwaters of the Mississippi.

MEN THAT HISTORY FORGOT

On the shelves of the public libraries of Iowa are many county histories. And in the book cases in private homes they are also available. While these volumes have great value and are indispensable in making historical research, they are lacking in many ways. The older volumes were written when information was not so generally obtainable or widely broadcast as now. Their natural limitations were to be expected; but in their biographical sections the apparent favoritism is lamentable and to be regretted. This can be understood and pardoned in part by reason of the lack of funds to gather material and publish such works.

The personal sketches included in their production often were obtainable only from individuals who were able to pay for the prominence given them, whether worthy of it or not, and omitting others equally or more entitled to mention. Yet, aside from personal memoirs, family biographies and articles written by local historians, they constitute the only readily accessible source of historical data so valuable in research. Through this individual fee system these county histories were actually made possible, and form the background of record covering those early days in Iowa life, inadequate and limited though they may be in contents.

Now and then articles appear in the press of the state dealing with the lives of individual early settlers of Iowa—sturdy pioneers, dependable men of purpose and character, both strong and patient, who have been the backbone of countless Hawkeye communities, whose lives and achievements are not mentioned in any historical publication. One such recently was published in the Sioux City Journal, written by Park Rispalje, who presented the story of a Woodbury county pioneer that history had forgotten, in which is said:

Hundreds of unsung and unheralded pioneering heroes contributed to the greatness of Iowa. They were the task force of ambitious, liberty loving, determined, stalwart men who fashioned a wild and dreary wilderness of plains into a garden spot of America.

Such was Francis William Wright, an English emigrant, whose name was given to Wright creek in Rock township, Woodbury county. This strong pioneer was typical of the many whose names do not appear in the available county histories of the state. Such histories generally are only partial annals of the progress of early Iowa . . . The details and data of the lives of many of the pioneers who settled on the land and developed the various sections of the state are seldom recorded and are little known.

In the effort to give the rightful niche in Iowa history to these unhonored heroes, Kenneth Edward Wright has compiled a factual account of the life of his pioneering grandfather, Francis William Wright, early settler in eastern Woodbury county, as being typical of the men who had such large part in making Iowa great. This biography is now catalogued in the state's genealogical library in the Department of History and Archives, at Des Moines, for record and reference.

The grandson has presented the highlights of a colorful career that probably was typical in many respects of the early pioneer. It is a story of the emigrant coming from England to America on a sailing vessel, working first in New York, then in Wisconsin, enlistment and service in the Civil war, after discharge coming to Iowa, working near Battle Creek, then Oto, and finally purchasing forty acres of land on a creek, now bearing his name, four miles from the present site of Correctionville, his struggle for a home established, details of his long and useful life, his marriage, raising a family, and his passing in 1921.

It is a story of pioneering well worth while and superbly told. Would that our libraries and homes contained many, many more such tales of the indomitable characters that builted Iowa, and made possible its glory as a commonwealth and the people and homes that constitute its real greatness.
